Not illustrated. 1904 edition. Excerpt: ...that neither proclamation nor diplomatic notice are obligatory, provided that the state of relations is such that hostilities will not be a surprise. Hostilities which constitute a surprise he characterises as brigandage and piracy. As instances of such attacks he mentions the invasion of Silesia in 1740, and the commencement of war by the United States in 1812 before the vote of Congress was known in England. Geffcken (1888, notes to Heffter, 120) regards a notice fixing a date, from which hostilities shall be considered to begin, to be necessary in the interests of neutrals and of the subjects of the belligerent states. To this view, so far as neutrals and the subjects of the state commencing hostilities are concerned, no objection can be taken; but if there is no duty towards the enemy state, there can be no duty towards its subjects. Probably M. Geffcken is influenced by the consideration that enemy subjects ought not to be exposed without warning to danger of life, and to the manifold risks and horrors of war upon land. This is so; but for reasons which have nothing to do with the illusory safeguard of a manifesto. PART III Oct. 9, 1899, demanding, inter alia, that all British troops should be withdrawn from the borders of the Republic and all reinforcements stopped; default of a satisfactory answer within forty-eight hours would be regarded as a formal declaration of war. On the ex-piration of this period the Transvaal forces crossed the frontier, and the President of the Orange Free State at the same time declared war on Great Britain in a manifesto addressed to his Burghers. Conclu-Looking at the foregoing facts as a whole it is evident that it is not necessary to adopt the artificial doctrine that notice must be given to...
